The Laurel Bush, ztc. 1 One I found lying under the laurel-bush, quite hidden by its leaves. It was all soaked with rain; I dried it in the sun, and then put it in my letter-box, telling nobody, for I meant to deliver it myself at the hall-door, with a loud ring--an English postman's ring. Our Scotch one used to blow his horn, you remember? Yes, said Miss Williams. She was leaning against the fatal bush, pale to the very lips, but her veil was down; nobody saw. What sort of a letter was it, David? Who was it to? Did you notice the handwriting? Why, I was such a little fellow, and he looked up in wonder and slight concern. How could I remember? Some letter that...
