Not illustrated. 1910 Excerpt: .indications for combining a number of gynecologic operations at one sitting may be broadly stated to lie in the avoidance of the necessity of repeated anesthesia, and in the gain of time and lessening of expense for the patient. An additional reason for performing all required operations at one sitting, which pertains especially to prolapsus operations, is contained in the fact that where the operations are spread out over two or more sittings the results of the operation first performed may be nullified or marred while awaiting the second sitting. The various operations entering into combination in the treatment of prolapsus, being intended to be mutually supporting and adjuvant, should all be performed at one sitting. Each operator who frequently performs gynecologic operations in combination has probably set for himself a time limit of safe anesthesia beyond which he is unwilling to protract operative procedures. In the author's opinion the time limit of safe anesthesia, in elective operations, should not exceed one and a half hours. The contraindications to the performance of combined gynecologic operations are those that pertain to operations in general, such as are found in diseased conditions of the patient's heart, lungs, kidneys, and other vital organs. If combined operations become necessary by reason of a vital indication, a certain measure of risk connected with the patient's general condition may be taken which would, as a rule, be unjustifiably assumed when the operative procedures are not necessary to save life....
