Excerpt: . . . and to stimulate them to face this current from the country and to establish themselves with the hope of becoming successful farmers and industrials in small towns. That this has been accomplished at all is owing to the fact that the people have been much helped in starting and the Jewish agricultural communities have been strengthened by the introduction of industrial interests, and into the midst of these industrial-agricultural settlements have been introduced certain social elements designed to attract and interest the young people and to hold them through the years when they would naturally be setting forth to the cities. The early years of these experiments were marked by great hardship and many seasons were necessarily passed before the type of immigrant who is destined to make a successful agriculturist was discovered. The Jewish people from Roumania, for example, do not make successful...
