It leaves everything to the employers themselves, who have to pay, and to the elected tribunals which have to make the awards. It is therefore palpable nonsense to talk of this measure as one of State insurance. The State contributes nothing but the compelling power. In the Decalogue officially laid down the first commandment is, that the employer shall be liable for every injury that occurs to hands in connection with employment. There is no question raised of negligence, no necessity imposed of proof. The accident proves itself. German employers have themselves publicly and emphatically avowed that they will not have the question of fault or negligence introduced. It would complicate matters and cost very much more than it would be worth. Besides, it would defeat the entire object of the Act. Wanton, deliberate causing of an accident is...
